Swiss employees not given enough support to act ethically, reveals Institute of Business Ethics' survey

A fifth of Swiss employees say that their organisation does not provide any of the elements of formal ethics programme

23rd May 2019: The Institute of Business Ethics today publishes the results of a survey which asks Swiss employees their views of ethics in their workplace.

The IBE asked employees whether their organisation had the four building blocks of a corporate ethics programme, including having written standards of ethical conduct such as a code of ethics; mechanisms to report misconduct; procedures to obtain advice and the provision of ethics training.

It reveals that only 12% of Swiss employees say that their organisation has all four building blocks, while 20% say that their organisation offers no work ethics-related information, training or support channels.

The IBE's Ethics at Work survey is the only one of its kind covering Switzerland. It provides real insight into employees' views on ethics across all sectors and job roles, and offers a context for employee experiences across Europe. Over 6,000 employees were surveyed across Europe, including 756 in Switzerland.

This is the first time that the survey, first introduced in the UK in 2005, has been conducted in Switzerland. It asks employees how they experience ethics in their day-to-day working lives and how they perceive corporate ethical culture. It looks at whether they have witnessed misconduct; whether they have reported it; and what if anything stops them from doing so.

To understand employees' perceptions of their organisation's engagement with stakeholders, respondents were asked to comment on whether they believe that their organisation acts responsibly in all its business dealings with key stakeholder groups such as customers, clients, suppliers. Employees in Switzerland have some of the most positive views of all European respondents. Swiss employees are amongst the most likely to say that their organisation acts responsibly in all its business dealings (80%); lives up to its stated policy of social responsibility (69%) and that issues of right and wrong are discussed in staff meetings (58%).

However, Swiss employees are less positive about their organisation's honesty than the European average, with only 20% saying that honesty is always practiced in their organisations (vs 29% in Europe).

Yet too few employees who have been aware of misconduct at work raise their concerns. Only 58% of those who have been aware of misconduct said that they did so and only a third say that their organisation provides a confidential means to report misconduct.

Philippa Foster Back CBE, Director of the Institute of Business Ethics said: "Providing a comprehensive ethics programme is an important way to encourage employees to speak up when they see something that might violate their organisation's ethical standards. The lack of support for Swiss employees is particularly worrying. Providing support for employees to do the right thing is vital in establishing a culture in which employees feel confident to raise their concerns.

Not only does an ethics programme support employees to do the right thing; it also provides assurance to stakeholders – like investors and customers – that the organisation is operating sustainably, with business ethics in mind.”

About the Ethics at Work survey

The IBE has surveyed British employees since 2005, but given that organisations are increasingly taking an integrated approach at the international level, we have expanded the number of countries included in the research to cover France, Germany, Ireland, Italy, Portugal, Spain, Switzerland and the UK within Europe.

The survey was completed by a total of 6,119 respondents across the eight European countries. It was comprised of a representative sample of about 750 working adults in each country who were aged 18+.

This report presents the findings of public research undertaken by ComRes on behalf of the IBE. ComRes is a member of the British Polling Council and abides by its rules. The survey was undertaken between 5th and 25th February 2018, and full data tables for 2018 and 2015 are available at www.comresglobal.com
